

He doesn't look a thing like Cheese Nips...

I think The Killers would agree with us when we say that rather than relying on what someone thought they heard, it is pretty important to check the accuracy of information.

On Thursday 12 February, Mr Giscard d'Estaing has been asked to speak to Trinity students on the future of Europe. This guy has contributed a lot to European politics. He's also French, in his eighties and is a man named Valéry. And he's been misquoted more times than the number of people who think Katy Perry in fact kissed a squirrel and liked it (why a squirrel would be wearing cherry chapstick is beyond us too).

On the night that he's speaking in Dublin, it's likely he's going to be accused of many things he did not say or write – like the way Madonna did not write about a virgin being touched for the thirty-first time.

So when you hear of people quoting what other people have said, you might want to check the original source of the quote. Or else, Jesus would be a Cheese Nip right now.
